This is to be a truthful james ac count about the Cranberry country in Pocahontas county. It is safe to say that this wilderness has in it the greatest variety of kinds both of flora and fauna of any given territory in West Virginia, for it has all that any other spot has and in addition has the Cranberry bog, which adds a people quit drinking, and the city creels. He had them both step. He his plow. large number of animals and plants people are passing laws to make the then accused Abey. to the list usually found in the woods. A stream that comes. into it clear as crystal and emerges. muddy and stained.

It is the summer resort of all kinds of birds and nowhere in West-Virginia is there anything to compare to this bird haven. There is a dyke probably across the narrow gateway that forms the exit to this broad and from the orderly confusion tents Lottom. This dyke not high enough to form a lake but of sufficient height to hold back the water shallow enough to be transformed into a bog by the growth of water plants. .

What we call the Cranberry country is the country on the southwestern side of Pocahontas county, which is drained by the two main forks of known as Glady Fork and North Fork. There are a lot of side streams each draining important valleys.

The highest peak is Barlow Top. something over four thousand feet in elevation. A long flat mountain top leads down from the top of this peak to the place of the forks, the distance being about ten miles. The formation is carboniferous being just west of the place that the big lime disappears underground. The land is rich and blue grass is indigenous to the soil. The timber, the first crop of which has been cut, was of mixed hardwood and evergreen. The land is rich. One of the reasons that this section is not cleared and settled was that the growth of timber was so heavy that it discouraged the pioneer.'
